

Removal of children from parents should be a last resort.

More rehabilitation centers that could support parents and children would be beneficial.

The system would be better if all parties of family could be brought together to work out a plan to support the affected parent/s and children in a conference setting outside of a terrible court setting where children are waiting long days and amongst compromised and challenging behaviors of others.

Early interventions or identification with family issues need to be supported and more family support services like child first to be encouraged as a first line.

Unfortunately, with the current Child Protection system there are too many cases that keep coming back into the system.

Child Protection Workers case loads are too high and too complex to make a difference.

Family reunification should always be a goal for all families.

Often families have little or no daily life skills or parenting skills.

Education is a key element for all people having and caring for children.

Education for the Community as a whole on Child Protection needs to be increased.

One area that needs to be looked at is the name of the system to a more holistic name other than Child Protection.

Grandparents raising Grandchildren should not be a first option but a last one.

The child protection system needs to be one that is more restorative than destructive in tearing families apart.

Jill Gaffney